The Sydney Opera House

Australia's Sydney Opera House was designed by Danish architect Jørn Utzon, after his design beat 232 other entries in a competition in 1955. Construction began in 1959, and Utzon moved to Sydney four years later. There were three construction stages: first the base, then the roof and then the interiors. The roof was the most complicated, because it is made of several different-sized shells. Utzon was one of the first people to use computers to design this stage. The Opera House opened on October 20, 1973, ten years after the government's completion date. The building contains the Concert Hall, which is the home of the Sydney Symphony Orchestra, and the Opera Theatre, which is the home of Opera Australia and the Australian Ballet. Utzon died on November 29, 2008.
