Lifelong magazine spoke with several local heroes to find out who their heroes are.

Lifelong: Henry Classon, you were the first firefighter on the scene in the devastating city fire last year. You and your team saved more than 150 people's lives. Who do you look up to and why?

Henry Classon: My hero is my wife, Gina Classon. No kidding. She's the hardest-working person I've ever met. She is an amazing mother to our five children; she runs our household and manages to volunteer full-time at the homeless shelter. I don't know how she does it.

Lifelong: Do your children agree with you?

Henry Classon: They'd better! She works tirelessly to make sure they are getting the education they deserve. There's nothing more important than that.

Lifelong: Adela Rubio, you are our city's education hero. You turned our city's ailing public schools into the wonderful educational institutions they are today. Who inspires you?

Adela Rubio: The person I most look up to is Maria Montessori. She had groundbreaking ideas about education, such as a child's ability to make his or her own decisions about education. I'm inspired by the way she treated children as competent humans and not people to be controlled.

Lifelong: And has this influenced your work here in our own public schools?

Adela Rubio: Absolutely. I believe in children's natural ability to make the right decisions.
