Citizen Journalists

Jamie lives in the northeast of Spain. He works full-time as a plumber, but in his spare time he's a citizen journalist. If he sees anything interesting or unusual, he records it on his smartphone before posting the video on his social media account. According to Jamie, some of his content has gone viral within hours of being published.

Alejandra, who lives in Mexico City, is also a citizen journalist. She's a journalism student at the university, but she prepares news reports in her free time. She investigates environmental issues in the area and writes about them in a weekly blog post. A lot of people follow her blog and a recent post about traffic pollution was even mentioned in a national newspaper.

Citizen journalism is nothing new, but social media has changed the way news is reported. Before smartphones, videos were recorded on movie cameras, which were expensive and heavy and there was no guarantee that anyone else would see them. Nowadays, you can upload your recordings to social media sites or create a live stream in seconds. Written content can also be uploaded to blogs and social media quickly and cheaply.

There are many reasons why people become citizen journalists.

In Jamie's case, he was fed up with television news. He said it never talked about his town. Similarly, Alejandra told us that important environmental issues weren't getting headlines in the national newspapers. Both of them were unhappy with the information they were getting so they decided to provide it themselves.

Some people argue that professional journalists are trained to find out the truth and to not spread false information. They worry that citizen journalists don't always know if a story is fake news. Others argue that traditional journalism can't possibly report everything and we need citizen journalists to help cover everything that's happening. It's difficult to say who's right, but citizen journalism won't be going away any time soon.

4 Read the text again. Are the statements True (T) or False (F)?

0 James works as a full-time journalist. F

1 Alejandra publishes blog posts every day.

2 Blogs and social media are good ways of publishing articles.

3 Alejandra thought national newspapers weren't paying attention to important problems.

4 Some people think citizen journalism is a useful way of sharing news.
